Host: Welcome to [Podcast Name], where we delve into the critical discourse surrounding the intersectionality of joy as a sociopolitical phenomenon.

In this podcast, I'll be unpacking the complexities of joy—not just as an individual emotion, but as a collective, structural force that drives political mobilization. We'll explore how joy, often trivialized as merely effective, operates as a radical form of agency capable of inciting transformative resistance.

Throughout this journey, I'll engage with a range of theoretical frameworks—from sociocultural studies to political philosophy—while grounding these ideas in real-world case studies.

Together, we'll explore how joy, when properly understood, can disrupt established power dynamics and become a cornerstone of political praxis.

So whether you're an academic or simply curious about new ways to think about the world, join me as we interrogate the profound sociopolitical implications of joy.
